SECTION II LESSONS LEARNED

1. Personnel: None

2. Operations:

a. High Altitude Reconnaissance.

1. Observation: Occasionally it is necessary to conduct BDA operations over or near heavily fortified enemy positions.

2. Evaluation: We have experienced the loss of several aircraft while conducting reconnaissance missions and BDA's over known heavily infested enemy terrain. As altitude increases relative safety from ground to air fire increases, however, the ability to pick up detailed information is greatly decreased. An improved observation capabilities, should enable the scouts to fly this type of mission at higher altitudes, thusly reducing casualties and loss of equipment.

3. Recommendation: That several OH-6A helicopters within each Air Cavalry Troop be equipped with X-76 anti-oscillation binoculars. This device will enable the helicopter to fly at high altitudes while maintaining the capability of obtaining detailed information of the terrain or action below.

b. Employment of Multiple Claymores.

1. Observation: The ability to remain undetected ~~while~~ on an ambush patrol is of paramount importance.

2. The employment of multiple claymores in an ambush position enhances the effectiveness of the patrol considerably. With the use of detonating cord and non-electric blasting caps, two or more claymores can be set off by one person using one firing device. This has proven to be highly effective primarily because it gives the impression of artillery rather than the standard personnel ambush.
